"On the part of the Commission, we have approved several projects for universities to train other universities," he added, saying he has been in a series of discussions with top universities in the country with "very strong" online learning capability.

"I am very happy that the top universities in the country with very strong capability for online learning are rising up to the challenge and actually giving free training programs in partnership with the Commission," he said.

"I was in discussion with De La Salle Saint Benilde, one of the top universities in the country with very strong online learning capability. They are going to give free online training for teachers on the first week of August," he added.

"In about an hour, I'll be sitting down with FEU [Far Eastern University], Philippine Normal University and two other universities that will also provide free training program for faculty members in the next two weeks," he furthered.

De Vera said slowly, CHED is making sure that the faculty members are getting trained and their respective institutions will be able to open classes next month.

To recall, the IATF on May 13, 2020 has approved the opening of classes for higher education institutions (HEIs) that will use flexible learning in August.

The official also mentioned their agency's online resource portal called "PHL-CHED Connect" that can be accessed through this link: <https://phlconnect.ched.gov.ph>.

He said the portal, launched by CHED earlier, could address concerns of students who have difficulty in acquiring required materials.

"The Commission already launched PHL-CHED Connect. It is an online platform where we put there the best materials that faculty members and students can use for flexible learning," he said.

He explained that students and HEIs faculty members would be able to access learning materials for free from the said platform as it contains thousands of texts, audio, and video presentation from top universities in the country. The materials can also be saved and printed.

"[At least] 60 universities in the country including top universities like Mapua, College of Saint Benilde, STI, and UP [University of the Philippines] Open University, have donated their online materials and put it in the online platform. This is open to the public, open to all now," he said.

"Faculty members when preparing for the opening of classes can already get very good online materials from this online portal," he added.

De Vera said CHED and its partners continue to populate the online platform with additional materials.

"There are some universities abroad who have also donated their materials there, and also international organizations like Fulbright Program," he added.

To recall, PHL CHED Connect also includes open access books from international partners of CHED such as Cambridge, Oxford, and the Australia National University Press.

In the case of students without internet connectivity, however, the Commission said flexible and blended learning would apply including limited face-to-face learning in areas under modified general community quarantine (MGCQ) and the distribution of physical learning materials. (PIA NCR)

"The tie-up with Converge Telco to give 100mbps for free in boosting the internet connection in every barangay will surely make learning accessible to all," said Mayor Salamat during the meeting held June 19, 2020 with the Public Schools District supervisors and the RANDY'S Advocate officers.

The mayor expressed his appreciation to the huge efforts given by the district supervisors, RANDY'S Advocate Reading Coordinators Association, Alfonso School Heads, reading teachers, and parents to make this project possible. ### No second wave of Covid-19 cases in PH: DOH exec

MANILA – The country is not experiencing a second wave of coronavirus disease (Covid-19) infections, a health official said Tuesday.

"We are not experiencing a second wave but an increase in the number of positive cases due to the increase in testing and because there is community transmission because of the lack of implementation of minimum health standards," Department of Health (DOH) Undersecretary Maria Rosario Vergeire said in a virtual Covid-19 presser.

Vergeire said the increase in cases "has been gradual and the country's health system is able to cope with it".

"This is reflected in our indicators, as of July 5, our case doubling time is still at 7.9 days. This means that it takes more than a week for the number of cases to double and we have enough resources to address the current need," she added.

According to the DOH, the first few months of the enhanced community quarantine allowed the country to ramp up its health system capacity.

"There is no particular profile of cases seen in our data. The recent increase is due to clustering in barangays in the National Capital Region and in Cebu and in workplaces in the National Capital Region," Vergeire said.

The DOH, Department of the Interior and Local Government (DILG), and concerned local government units have intensified their contact tracing and isolation protocols to contain the identified clusters. (source:PNA)
